Spring skiing in Abetone

Italy has Tuscany, whose spring, would do well as Finnish summer. They have the world's best, but affordable restaurants and excellent wineries. As if this would not be enough when you get used to this gentle life, they have ski resorts in the Apennine mountains, almost comparable with those in the Alps.

- Dear passengers, captain speaking. We'll be landing in 10 minutes to Florence. The weather is sunny. Temperature is 19 degrees, a weak wind.

Well well. I have two pairs of skis along, alpine and cross country. Should I have gone to Lapland. The flight would have cost the same, but I think I have had my fair share of sautéed reindeer.

The warm breath of the sun greets me at the Florence airport. It's almost embarrassing to carry a skibag. The termina cafe, however, is filled with familiar foreigners, who are coming to the same annual meeting. We find the Abetone winter sports coach, whose cellar is beginning to fill up with ski bags and luggages. We seem to have more of these strong-in-their-faith.

Did I take the skies along in vain?

We've driven an hour and the surroundings still look far too springish. The road starts to steepen and transforms to serpentine. Then, between the trees I catch a glimpse of snow-peaked mountains. We continue to rise and see patches of snow in shadowy spots, then even on the sun-side, the roofs of houses. As we approach to Abetone, the roofs have half a meter of snow and the road sides at least three meters! It is the first week of March and we are in Central Italy!

Abetone became a popular recreation area, where the aristocracy fled the city heat, when this passing through road between Tuscany and Modena was built in 1776. For example Giacomo Puccini had a villa in the village of Boscolungo in the early 1900s.

Most of us have bookings in hotel Le Piramide. It's been built to its current form in 1989, but part of the building is from the 1300's. It's name comes from stone pyramids marking the boundary between municipals. After having accommodated I find the hour too late even for the illuminated ski piste and recognise my hunger. The restaurant is full of familiar people and I decide with give Piramide's chef a chance. Pasta corta setaro con cavolo nero su fonduta di pecorino locale or something like that is pretty molto buono, or something like that, and Tutto mandarino or something like that is cold and hot lemon sorbet and, once and for all is yummy. Grappa weighs in my eyelids and I decide a nap before the conquest of the disco floor.

I wake up at seven o'clock. What do you mean seven? After all, I went to take a nap at eight.

Well well, that was like putting money in the bank, eleven hours of sleep.

Must stay calm. Morning sauna, breakfast, and so forth. The sights in the gym didn't look interesting. Maybe I'll give it another chance. Some day.

Lift capacity at least adequate

Abetone's first ski lift was built in 1936. It was an eccentric, 20-seater sleigh, on wheels in the summer. Although cord-driven, it was sterable. The verticle climb was some 323 m, and the upper peaks and off-points were reached with the skis on shoulders.

I considered the most intelligent way to start my skiing was to take a free ski bus to Monte Gomiton gondola station. A mistake! To reach the lift station one has to climb from the parking lot to a height of about three-storey building with one's skis on one's untrained shoulders. Is one supposed to be some kind of a sportsman? Well, maybe it's good to warm up the muscles.

The time is a minute to nine and the lift doesn't move. Adam Harvey from Ireland and me form a queue.

The Italians generally come at 10-11, ski for an hour, go for coffee, ski another hour and go for lunch, which lasts until the ski lifts close. At lunch, they usually discuss the excellent meals they've had before. The Finns have their own variant of the discussion. They drink and brag laughing how drunk they've been before. This doesn't even necessarily require a table.

Finally the gondolas start their daily work, and we jump to the first one. In a moment we rise above the trees and the spectacular scenery opens to us. Raps Raps Raps the camera raps, and a digital memory card saves sights for the friends at home to envy. But then we dive into a cloud. We notice the upper station at the last moment and are a bit busy to collect our gear.

We enter the heavenly bliss of the Apennines and feel like wrapped in cotton wool. The slope map is barely visible through the clouds. There are five pistes to choose from back to the lower gondola station. We try to find the one closest to the elevator line. There, after all, we saw something. Adam is here for the second day and knows the pistes. I follow his red jacket.

One's legs are one's eyes in the fog

We proceed cautiously from one piste sign to the next. Sense of balance does it's tricks and I fall on my back at low speed. Below, however, the visibility improves and the landscape opens up. We speed down the groomed runway meandering through the forest back to the lower station, still almost empty of people.

We had five great runs on almost untouched slopes before almost every gondola brings people up. However, the lift capacity is so good that we never have to queue.

Then we continue to the top and pass some easy pistes on the way to the eastern runs. There, the slopes are almost entirely within forest and the visibility is much better. The slopes continue a few hundred meters lower than the gondola line and the snow there is wet and makes one push some to get all the way down.

The next day, foggy weather continues, but it's been snowing all night long and the sky continues it's good work throughout the day leaving us half a meter of new snow. The lift accessible off-piste areas in Abetone are large enough for a small army, but in the foggy weather the deep-snow guerrillas are not many. The hasty intake of our lunch surprises our friends, who have spent their day in the restaurant. We don't have time or enthusiasm to explain our haste.

Having fun on the back slopes and off

A new ski paradise opens to our eyes and to our skis, when we reach the Mont Gomito in bright sunlight next morning. The long-long slope to Val di Sole, on the ski map coloured to be of moderate difficulty is so wide and meandering, that everyone can enjoy it according to his skills. There's also a shorter and narrower fast lane down. There is a risk of death for everyone on such a narrow slope. There is always someone in front of you or coming fast from behind. Fortunately, helmets have become fashionable even in Italy and the Scandinavians are no longer laughed at.

From Val di Sole we take the easternmost lift. At the right side of the lift line a broad off-piste spreads with only a few signs of carving. At the top of the lift-line I notice two boys climbing with the skis on their shoulders. We follow them.

We pant for twenty minutes to get over the ridge, and: Voila! There is an extensive shallow bowl with at least 30 cents of new snow. We hit the slope and do some divine turns. The wind has re-spread the snow to it's own taste; in some places it's so deep that one can almost lean on it. In other places the hard surface is in sight.

Whatever the reason, the next moment I find myself inside a pile of snow. So, this is how it feels to be in an avalanche. I get my upper body easily above the snow, and break to a laugh hide my embarrassment. Getting up is not easy, for the dindings didn't open. Neither did the knee ligaments, thank gods. And neither did the poles break free, but my thumbs are very sore.

I open my jacket to leave twenty litres of snow where it came from and I continue my ride as elegantly as before but much less arrogantly and enjoying every moment to huge granite building. The building is a hotel-to-be from the thirties. The project was cut by WWII and was never finished. Only a café is open at the basement and we think we have earned a coffee break.

Two lift lines lead northwards from Val di Sole and one back to Mont Gomito. The latter line is so long and slow, that in cold weather, if much perspired, one should avoid it. Otherwise the Mont Gomito lift boys have the unpleasant duty to raise the frozen tourists from the lift seat. Better alternatives are, either to dry up in the bar of the granite castle or ski down to the parking area, and take a bus to the hotel.

Abetone slopes are mostly so called red or blue, but their length give enough challenge to ski down nonstop. The only black piste, begins at the right side of the upper station of Mont Gomito, but off-piste areas give enough challenge to the powder freaks. The longest run begins at the highest point of the Val di Sole area and pass Mont Gomito and Selletta and ends up in Le Regine, the western-most village of Abetone. Before you start that longest run, you should climb a few metres to a natural terrace and enjoy the scenery on the Mediterranean Sea and Sardegna.

The best place to stay is in the village of Abetone, with the best services, as well as a chair lift to Sellettan in two drives. From there you can ski down to the lower gondola station of Monte Gomino, and thus conquer the whole skiable area of the Abetone ski resort.

All the restaurants and cafes are in the village of Abetone. In other villages, they are in the hotels.

Post Tour in Siena and surroundings

Siena, an excellent choice for our Post Tour headquarters. I had 2h20min to pay off my sleep debt caused by late disco.

Senius and Atchius, sons of Remus, founded Siena around 400 BC. In the 12th century, it declared independence, and the city's golden age began.

Catholics did not have permission to do banking, but Jews did, and they elevated Siena as one of the three most important banking centers in the world.

The bank could sentence a debtor to death. It could sell his wife and daughter to a brothel.

A very masculin competition

The clergy of Siena wanted to build a larger church than St. Peter's Church in Rome. Fortunately, the plaque killed so many builders that only the original cruciform church was completed.

When the basement of the cathedral was emptied in 1999, frescoes were found. Under it a large Gothic church emerged. Beneath it a Romanesque church and under it a pagan temple.

Secular power had its part in the competition". The silhouette of the town shows, that the tower of the "Palace of the People" on the edge of Piazza Del Campo stands higher than the cathedral. In San Gimignano, the city of "One Hundred Towers", the competition was for which family had the tallest tower, as that family was the most remarkable. San Gimignano is also the background in the Anglo-Italian film "Tea with Mussolini" by F. Zeffirelli".

Food and wine

We had wine and olive oil tasting in Fattoria dei Barbi Winery and Ristorante Millevini and Enacoteca Italiana built inside a 1500-century fortress. In the shop we walked among display cases filled with hundreds of wine bottles. You just point a EAN reader at the bottles you want. At the cash register the bottles were waiting.

Our best dinner we had in Osteria de Logge. George Clooney, Al Gore, George Michael ja Romano Prodi had been our predecessors. The paperthin slices of black and white pig melt in mouth. The main course was "Guancia di chianina cotta a bassa temperatura con purea di papate e verdure salate", yummy loose piece of meat with mash and side dishes.

Crazy woman driving a taxi

At Florence station a Chrysler PT Cruiser taxi stops in front of me. A beautiful woman in a floral top hat and cloak steps out of the car. "I'm Caterine. How are you". The car is full of toys, balloons, etc. However, she starts to push my ski bag inside the car and soon we hurry towards the airport.

- My husband, a taxi driver, died of cancer. At his request, I now to drive a taxi. I once took a hairless girl to a cancer hospital. Since then, I have done volunteer work and collected money for children suffering from cancer treatment, organized events, and carried them and relatives to the hospital. My car and my outfit I have edited as such the delight of children. Caterine is one of the most famous citizens of Florence today. Donna matte, her male colleagues say.
